Good morning Forest Landowner e-Update Subscribers,

I’ll be the first to admit it – I’m mad at this winter. It’s been gray, wet, and windy. But no snow to speak of. BORING. I know not everyone loves white mud, but it does brighten up the world a bit. And I have new snow pants I want to wear.

Gray, wet, and windy make it tough to get excited about going outside. But here are some ideas for engaging with your woods, even in the winter.

1. Walk your property boundary lines. Deciduous trees have dropped their leaves, giving a better line of sight, the weather is cool, making walking rugged terrain easier, briars are less fierce, poison ivy is beaten back, and ticks and mosquitoes are hibernating (although I found a deer tick on one of my pups just last week).

Look for dead/dying boundary trees that need to be replaced, refresh your paint marks as needed, and see what forest management activities your neighbors are engaging in.

Also look for any woodland health issues such as patches of dead trees. If you think there is a health issue, contact your local forester. You can learn more about new and emerging forest health issues at the 2020 Woods & Wildlife Conferences.

2. Winter is also a good time to take a look at your woodland management plan. Your management plan should be treated like a living document. It will need to be updated periodically. Some things that may need to be updated include: maps, aerial photos, your list of management activities, and forest health concerns.

If your plan is relatively new, you can make updates by simply adding notes. If your plan is

VFLEP Partners & Sponsors

Virginia Cooperative Extension

Puts university knowledge into the hands of people.

Virginia Department of Forestry

Learn about cost-share programs, forest management options, buy seedlings, and find your local forester.

Virginia Sustainable Forestry Initiative State

10 or more years old and a lot has changed, you may want to talk to your forester about getting a new one.

If you’ve never had a plan or don’t know why you need one, you can learn more at the Central Virginia Beginning Woodland Owners’ Retreat in March.

3. If you plan to do any prescribed burning this year, winter is a good time to refresh your firebreaks (as long as the soil isn’t too soggy). And speaking of prescribed burning, the Virginia Prescribed Fire Council has a new publication for landowners. Also, we will be offering a prescribed fire class for landowners in Galax this spring. Dates will be available in the March e-Update.

4. Engage your family in the land. A fun woodland activity this time of year is to search for deer sheds. Most deer in Virginia cast off their antlers sometime between January and March. Another fun (and challenging!) activity is winter tree identification. Some useful resources to help you include:
